NORTHERN SPECULATIONS. In a late article referring to President Davis musage, the New York Herold says his policy may be summed up in a few words. The President, it says, "proposes simply to do as he has he present nothing new, he Merely advises perseverance and fortitude, and assures his tollowars that this will be the closing year of the war. We shall find, therefore, in the acts and declarations of JEFF. DAVIS immediately preceding the issue of this message the details of his polley for the future." 'In this brief statement there is much more of fairness than usual in the Herald's articles. The South "proposes nothing new." Determined only to secure her inde pendence, it is proposed to be accomplished by sustaining the same principles announced at the outbreak of the revolution, by making the same sacrifices, and conquering the same enemy. Of this there can be no mistake. Gur efforts to hold the Mississippi, and the results of our success, is the principal topic of the same article, and it contains some import ant admissions. "All his [President Davis" anxieties, his plans, his hopus, have recently seemed to center upon one point, and that point is Vielsburg. In other words, the grand scheme of the rebels at present is to retain the practical possession of the Mississippl. This they believe to be only the more essential because they Imagine that the war is nearly over."

Assuming this much, the Herald asserts that those who have carefully considered the signs of the times, can have but little doubt that if haps en muree, but probably one by one, under the Confederate Constitution, which permits pleasure; and adds: "But say General BARKS and others of like opinions, the cast and west are linked together by great railroads, and this connection cannot be oroken, because the
